

The Journal for Cultural and Religious Theory (JCRT)

1.3 |

For Love of the Things Themselves: Derrida's Hyper-Realism

John D. Caputo

Read this article on JCRT

<https://jcrt.org/archives/01.3/caputo/>

© 2000 John D. Caputo.

<https://jcrt.org/archives/01.3/caputo/>

Published by Whitestone Publications. ISSN 1530-5228. Licensed under CC BY 4.0.

Caputo - For Love of Things Themselves - JCRT 1.3

John D. Caputo

Villanova University

Editors Note: This article will appear in "On Realism," a special issue of Social Semiotics, vol. 11, no. 1 (2001), Guest Editor Niall Lucy.

A Work of Love. If the real means what is present, what is really there, full blown and unvarnished, then deconstruction, as the deconstruction of the metaphysics of presence, is the deconstruction of realism, of any such real or full presence, which can always be shown to be a constituted effect. In just the same way that representation and non-presence precede and make possible the 'effect' of 'presence' (VP, 58/SP, 52),¹ deconstruction would take a devilish delight in showing the way that unreality and irreality precede and make 'reality' possible, making possible and impossible whatever would dare to pass itself off as reality. Deconstruction would never tire of telling realists Nietzsche's story of how the real world became a fable.

And contrary to what phenomenology—which is always a phenomenology of perception—has tried to make us believe, contrary to what our desire cannot fail to be tempted into believing, the thing itself always escapes (la chose m'me se d'robe toujours). (VP, 117/SP, 104)

To surrender to the other, and this is the impossible, would amount to giving oneself over in going toward the other, to coming toward the other but without crossing the threshold, and to respecting, to loving even the invisibility that keeps the other inaccessible. (Sauf, 91/ON, 74)²

Husserl insists that there is no pure intuition of the other as such; that is, I have no originary access to the alter-ego as such... That is why he/she is the other. This separation, this dissociation is not only a limit, but it is also the condition of the relation to the other, a non-relation as relation... a non-intuitive relation 'I don't know who the other is, I can't be on the other side. (QE, 71)³

The other is God or no matter whom, more precisely, no matter what singularity, as soon as any other is totally other. (Sauf, 92/ON, 74)

In the language of abstraction, that which is the difficulty of existence and of the existing person never actually appears; even less is the difficulty explained... If abstract thinking is assumed to be the highest, it follows that scientific scholarship and thinkers proudly abandon existence and leave the rest of us to put up with the worst.

But is there a better way of overcoming hallucination than to pay attention to the other? For me the other is 'the real thing', and reference to the other is what breaks with hallucination, if such a break is possible. In order to respect the transcendence or the heterogeneity of the other, we have to pay attention. (QE, 77).

¹. VP: La voix et le ph'nom'ne (Paris: PUF, 1967); SP: Speech and Phenomena and Other Essays on Husserl's Theory of Signs. Trans. David Allison (Evanston: Northwestern University Press, 1973).

². Sauf: Sauf le nom (Paris: Galil'ee, 1993). Eng. trans. "Sauf le nom (Post-Scriptum)," trans. John Leavey, Jr., in ON: On the Name, ed. Thomas Dutoit (Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1995), pp. 33-85.

³. QE: Derrida, 'Hospitality, Justice and Responsibility,' in Questioning Ethics: Contemporary Debates in Philosophy, ed. Richard Kearney and Mark Dooley (New York: Routledge, 1999).

Undecidability is not indeterminacy. Undecidability is the competition between two determined possibilities or options, two determined duties...Now, because there are contexts and singularities, there are movements, processes and transformations, and for transformation to occur something has to be determined, something is determinable...There is, however, the future, what is to come, and I would say there is indeterminacy of the coming of the future. But that is not a relativity of meaning. (QE, 79)

Notes

John D. Caputo, David R. Cook Professor of Philosophy at Villanova University where he has taught since 1968, works in the area of deconstruction and religion. He has recently published More Radical Hermeneutics: On Not Knowing Who We Are (Indiana, 2000), which continues his project of building a working relationship between deconstruction and hermeneutics. He recently co-edited God, the Gift and Postmodernism (Indiana, 1999), a collection of studies based on a conference held at Villanova featuring Jacques Derrida in dialogue with Jean-Luc Marion and other major postmodern theorists. He is the author of Deconstruction in a Nutshell: A Conversation with Jacques Derrida (New York: Fordham University Press, 1997), winner of a Choice 'Outstanding Academic Book Award,' and The Prayers and Tears of Jacques Derrida: Religion without Religion (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1997). He is also the author of Against Ethics: Contributions to a Poetics of Obligation with Constant Reference to Deconstruction (1993), which is an attempt to formulate a postmodernist ethics; and Demythologizing Heidegger (1993), a critical reappraisal of Heidegger; Radical Hermeneutics: Repetition, Deconstruction and the Hermeneutic Project (1987), which revisits hermeneutics in the light of deconstruction. He is also the author of Heidegger and Aquinas: An Essay on Overcoming Metaphysics (1982), and The Mystical Element in Heidegger's Thought (1978, 1986). He is past Executive Co-Director of the Society for Phenomenology and Existential Philosophy, and Editor of the book series, "Perspectives in Continental Philosophy" (Fordham University Press); past president of the American Catholic Philosophical Association, a past member of the National Board of Officers of the American Philosophical Association, and of the Executive Committee of the American Philosophical Association, Eastern Division. He has held research fellowships from the National Endowment for the Humanities (1992-93) and from the American Council of Learned Societies (1983-84).

Copyright © held by the author(s). 2000 John D. Caputo. All rights reserved.
 Updated 07/28/21.
jcr.org/archives/01.3/caputo
