*But one thing I do know,
 O Zarathustra: Whoever
 would kill most thoroughly, laughs.*

—Nietzsche

Recently I ran across an article on laughter that said it wanted to examine ‘uses of laughter in the literal sense of the word.’¹ The author clearly meant that he wanted to discuss the act of laughter, but that’s not what he said; and, however unconscious his choice of terms, ‘the literal sense of laughter’ was over-determined. Sense connotes ‘meaning,’ and it is precisely the meaning of laughter, meaning in laughter, not to mention theories of laughter that thinkers have been trying to pin down since antiquity.

The beginning is a feeling of the ‘I’ that, in every possible gesture and especially in each of its own gestures, experiences something false, a deformation of the inside with respect to which all faithful representation seems a curse against the spirit. It is a feeling in which the ‘I,’ looking at itself in the mirror, discerns a pamphlet stuck to it, even incorporated into it, and, looking outside, laments himself, amazed to see in the face of his fellow men the fullness of comical masks... The disjunction between appearance and essence lies at the basis of both the sublime and the comical; the small sign of the corporeal points to the indescribable.²

On a very basic level the unity of the body provides for the identity that is necessary, but not at all sufficient, for the unity of the self. Nietzsche, quite consistently, holds that the unity of the body, like all unity, is itself not an absolute fact: ‘The evidence of the body reveals a tremendous multiplicity’ (The Will to Power, 518). ...And though...the ‘I’ always seems to refer to the same thing, the content to which it refers and the interests for which it speaks do not remain the same. It is constantly in the process of changing. This process may sometimes tend in the direction of greater unity. Such unity, however, which is at best something to be hoped for, certainly cannot be presupposed. Phenomena like akrasia, or weakness of will, and self-deception, not to mention everyday inconsistency, are constantly posing a threat to it.³

²Der Anfang ist ein Ichgef’hl, das in jeder m’glichen, zumal in jeder eigenen Geb’rde ein Falsches, eine Verunstaltung des Innern erf’hrt, dem also gerade die treueste Darstellung den Geist zu l’stern scheint, und das in den Spiegel schauend ein ihm angeheftetes, ja einverleibtes Pamphlet auf sich gewahr wird, nach au’en blickend in den Gesichtern seiner Mitmenschen die F’lle komischer Masken klagend bestaunt. [Wenig bedurfte er also um die k’rperliche Parodie auf ihn selbst in eine geschriebene umzusetzen: er brauchte nur den Gegensatz seines Wesens verschweigend, das Zerrbildliche der Erscheinung mit verkehrter Mimik zu erf’hlen. Damit gewann er schon beinah die erhabene Geste! Denn erhaben wei’ sich das Ich in jener ersten Parodie, und der Gestaltung des Erhabenen musste die Entwertung der Geb’rde als eines guten Leumunds vorausgehen.] Das Missverh’ltnis der Erscheinung zum Wesen liegt dem Erhabenen wie dem komischen zugrund: das k’rperliche als das geringe Zeichen deutet auf das Unbeschreibliche.” Max Kommerell, Jean Paul, 4th edition (Frankfurt am Mein: Vittorio Klostermann, 1966), p. 48. always the gesture of being at a loss in language; it is always a 'gag' in the literal sense of the word, which indicates first of all something put in someone's mouth to keep him from speaking and, then, the actor's improvisation to make up for an impossibility of speaking. But there is a gesture that felicitously establishes itself in this emptiness of language and without filling it, makes it into humankind's most proper dwelling. Confusion turns to dance, and 'gag' to mystery.⁴

In an art theater proper, one rarely sees an actor who can really walk and stand. As a matter of fact, I have seen only one, but what B[eckmann] is able to do, I have not seen before. He is not only able to walk, but he is also able to come walking. To come walking is something very distinctive, and by means of this genius he also improvises the whole scenic setting. He is able not only to portray an itinerant craftsman; he is also able to come walking like one and in such a way that one experiences everything, surveys the smiling hamlet from the dusty highway, hears its quiet noise, sees the footpath that goes down by the village pond when one turns off there by the blacksmith's where one sees B[eckmann] walking along with his little bundle on his back, his stick in his hand, untroubled and undaunted. He can come walking onto the stage followed by street urchins whom one does not see.⁵
