

The Journal for Cultural and Religious Theory (JCRT)

2.2 |

Absolute Nothingness and Taylor's Imagology

Thomas J J Altizer

Read this article on JCRT

<https://jcrt.org/archives/02.2/altizer/>

© 2001 Thomas J J Altizer.

<https://jcrt.org/archives/02.2/altizer/>

Published by Whitestone Publications. ISSN 1530-5228. Licensed under CC BY 4.0.

Altizer - Absolute Nothingness and Taylor's Imagology - JCRT 2.2

Thomas J. J. Altizer
SUNY Stony Brook, Emeritus

Mark Taylor has remarked many times recently that theology has come to an end in our new world and is now wholly anachronistic, but the question can be asked if Taylor's recent work is not in deep continuity with his previous theological work, a work whose seminal expression is in Erring: A Postmodern A/theology.^[^1] For despite its comprehensive range, this book has a genuine theological center, and even a Christian one, as it calls forth a milieu of "unoriginal origin," which is an eternal cross(ing) of the word, and one revealing scripture anew. Here is a thoroughly incarnational Christology, and a truly Christocentric theology, but one in which the divine is forever embodied, and the word is always already inscribed. Yet this incarnation is an embodiment of the death of that God who is only God, for the word is never disembodied, and its kenotic emptying embodies the death of transcendent originality and the end of a solitary causa sui. While enacting the end of history, this book knows a history which begins with the incapacity or refusal to say "Yes to Nay," and ends with the ability and willingness to say Amen, an Amen which is a "Mazing Grace," and one in which the disappearance of origin is the "end of the end".^[^2] If thereby this is not an apocalyptic ending, it is nevertheless a genuine ending, and Taylor can ask if the disappearance of the subject, which is being realized in our midst, is an embodiment of that death of God, which is the realization of the dissemination of the incarnate word. Yet this dissemination is a nihilistic dissemination, one completing nihilism itself, but the completion of nihilism is a reversal of nihilism, a reversal in which the fullness of nihilism is identical with the will to overcome nihilism completely, and to overcome it through an eternal and kenotic cross(ing).

Notes

Thomas J. J. Altizer is thankfully retired from the State University of New York at Stony Brook where he was a professor of religious studies and is now engaged in furthering and hopefully completing his theological work which has always centered upon the death of God.

Copyright © held by the author(s). 2001 Thomas J. J. Altizer All rights reserved.
Updated 07/28/21.
jcrt.org/archives/02.2/altizer
